Second, even those who cite biblical warrants detach these concepts from Scripture. For example, many of the authors cite the notion of imago dei, immediately drawing the conclusion from one line in Genesis that either humans are thus created by God as unique and individual or that, because God is creative, it is human nature to likewise be creative. But it is methodologically deficient to draw conclusions from a single scriptural verse. If biblical warrants are going to be invoked, they must be fleshed out. Third, one cannot draw adequate theological conclusions from one or two biblical concepts. As in science, to practice the discipline well, one must deal with all the data; one cannot simply select the data that best support one's conclusions and ignore the rest. Thus, the notion of the imago dei must be related to, and interpreted in light of, other central theological concepts and communal practices—for example, sin, discipleship, prophetic justice, forgiveness, the people of Israel, and the Christian ecclesia.

The only essay that embodies this sort of methodological rigor, and the only one that offers anything new and insightful, is "Cloning the Human Body" by Stanley Hauerwas and Joel Shuman. In characteristic form, Hauerwas and Shuman change the question, claiming "the question for us is not whether cloning is a good or a bad thing....'Cloning' is not a new thing for Christians....but whose body, exactly, should we be nonsexually reproducing? For Christians have for nearly two thousand years been about the business of nonsexually reproducing the one body that matters most, and indeed the only one that must be reproduced in pursuit of the human good, and that is Christ's body." Hauerwas and Shuman's argument unfolds scripturally (working primarily from the New Testament rather than Genesis, as would befit a Christian analysis), unpacking the concept of the human body through a Pauline interpretation of baptism. The authors resist the modern tendency to make Pauline language "'mere' metaphor" and hold that baptism changes one's embodiment such that, for Christians, one's primary identity no longer resides in one's genes and genes no longer determine one's destiny. In a move that would resonate with Rifkin, the authors suggest that practices like baptism commit Christians to certain realities, in this case regarding the body, which in turn affect how we live out our relationship with others, with nature, and with God.

The books by Kolata and Rifkin are informative, accessible, thought-provoking, and enjoyable to read. Those interested in theological analysis must, unfortunately, await future publications. □

Our Sunday Visitor's Encyclopedia of Catholic Doctrine:

the GUEST HOUSE ADVANTAGE

If It Wasn't For This...

No one turned away

Our Rochester, Minnesota Guest House treatment facility for chemical dependencies includes the services of physicians, psychologists, nurses, counselors, physical therapists and spiritual advisors. Generous donors assure that no man will be turned away, or his stay shortened, because of the inability to pay. The question then becomes not how much it costs... but how much you care.

...There Wouldn't Be This.

Making peace with God

The prisoner wonders how the priest can have such an understanding of how he feels. A priest who, before entering Guest House, was himself a prisoner, unable to find the strength to break free of alcoholism. "Staying sober, making a new life – not easy goals to reach... alone," the priest says. And the prisoner, at last, comes to accept God as his partner in the battle.

The Dying of the LIGHT

The Disengagement of Colleges and Universities from their Christian Churches

JAMES TUNSTEAD BURTCHAELL

Numerous colleges and universities in the United States were founded as educational enterprises sponsored by Christian denominations, but many no longer claim any relationship with their churches. Even on most of the campuses that are still listed by churches as their affiliates there is usually some concern expressed about how authentic or enduring that tie really is. The Dying of the Light explores the dynamics of church-school relations and shows how and why they have tended to wither over time.

"A superbly researched account of the historical fate of the 'religious identity' of seventeen church-related colleges representing seven denominational traditions. Its unblinking portrayal of progressive spiritual enervation is supported by an enormous wealth of evidence, which is set forth with critical sympathy and in language of striking freshness. . . . A magnificent achievement."
— PHILIP GLEASON

"Time and again, as this wide-ranging and provocatively written study shows, the lofty goal of uniting faith and learning has resulted in the triumph of learning over faith for Christians both Protestant and Catholic. Burtchaell's bold and bracing book should be read by all Christians, whether in the academy or not, tempted to think that higher education will increase the influence of the gospel."
— D. G. HART
